

The Louden Singletree

Writing and Visual Art from the University of the Fraser Valley Issue 2 / September 2010

The Louden Singletree

Writing and Visual Art from the University of the Fraser Valley

The Louden Singletree

Issue 2

EDITORIAL BOARD

Hilary Kim Morden
Sonja Szlovicsak
Nathan Owen
Jennifer Colbourne
April Hodson
Miriam Huxley
Ray de Kroon

LAYOUT

Sonja Szlovicsak

FACULTY ADVISORS

Helene Littmann
Andrea MacPherson

SUPPORT STAFF

Lesley Poh

COVER ART

If Fish Could Talk, Catherine Prentice

BACK COVER ART

Paragon, Grant Morden

READERS

Hilary Kim Morden
Nathan Owen
Sonja Szlovicsak
April Hodson
Miriam Huxley
Jennifer Colbourne
Pamela Hutchins
Lisete Isaak
Rebekah Duprey
Brittany Weisner

PRINTING

International WebExpress

Contents © 2010 Louden Singletree for the authors.

Louden Singletree | September 2010

About this issue

Welcome to the second issue of the Louden Singletree.

The greatest desire of the 2010 Editorial Board was to build on the success of the first issue – and we believe we have succeeded. By continuing to publish the fiction and poetry of students, faculty, alumni and staff as well as adding a selection of outstanding visual art, we have honoured the goals set by the first Editorial Board and continued to grow and develop as a showcase for the creative work produced at UFV.

The production of a student literary and arts magazine is an endeavour of love, dedication, inspiration, teamwork and not a small amount of frustration. Every step of the process, from forming a cohesive group to advertising, sorting, reading, discussing, selecting, printing, announcing, encouraging, presenting and then starting all over again, is done on a voluntary basis by a dedicated group of students with advice and guidance from faculty and staff. It is an amazing process and one that I truly enjoyed being a part of.

We are very proud of this issue. Proud of the work we have done, but even more so, proud of the high quality of literature and visual art that we are able to showcase in this edition of the Louden. This issue is proof, once again, of the strong literary and arts commitment and the wealth of talent that resides here at UFV.

Hilary Kim Morden

CONTENTS

---

SHORT FICTION

Miriam Huxley	Emerald	7
Hilary Kim Morden	Almost	8
	Ghosts of her Life	10

POETRY

Hilary Kim Morden	Memento Mori	13
	four: twenty three	14
	Threads	16
	Ocean Triolet	17
	all the memories a body can bear	18
Shannon McConnell	beyond the showbox	21
	departure	22
	exposure	24
Jocelyn Rintoul	A Smile in the Sky	26
	Into the Ocean	28
Ron Dart	Conrad and the Goat	30
Janet Vickers	Fish and Chips	33
	Ornaments	34
	The Wedding	36
Joshua Frede	The Ticking of a Clock	38
Jennifer Colbourne	The Keeper	40
	If Only Romance Were Dead	42
Ray de Kroon	Sonnet IV	43
Melanie Schindrig	Station	45
Catherine Prentice	Crossing Over	46
	Incubus	48

Suzanne Kittell	Convallaria Majalis	50
	Vertebrae	54
	i am not prince hamlet	55
	restless tradition	56
Lisete Isaak	My Forest	57
Nathan Owen	At the Dinner Table	58
Matthew Loewen	Fall	59
Esther Campbell	Grief	60
Alexandra Watkins	Untitled	62
	Eggshell	63
Hilary Turner	American Haiku	65
Jennifer Maxwell	Speak Why	66
	VISUAL ART
Scott Varga	Hypnotized Magician	6
Jessie Somers	Little Fawn	12
	Bending Time	61
Erin Dugdale	Untitled	20
Grant Morden	Snow Gnome	29
	Space Invader	64
	Time Released	68
Daniel Mack	For Eyes	37
Rachel Chapman	Rajasthan	44
Maurice Motut	Stiletto Foot	53
	Notes on Contributors	69
	Acknowledgements	72

Hypnotized Magician
Scott Varga

Louden Singletree | September 2010

Emerald

Miriam Huxley

He was laying in the wooden box surrounded by plush material: a shimmering satin bed in a luminous emerald. Emerald; it was the first crayon he pulled out of the crayon box at one. And at two, it was the emerald crayon that his pudgy hands shoved into his mouth, tiny teeth mashing the crayon into an emerald oblivion. It was the first unnatural colour that tinged his vomit after his mother forced him to cleanse his system of crayon. After he attempted to eat the crayon, it became his favourite colour. The vomit-incident had created a love for the colour that would never fade. After that day, everything had to be emerald. His room, his sheets, the tux he wore to his prom, the colour scheme at his wedding; no other colour would do. Only, and always, emerald. As I looked at his breathless body, it was the colour that replaced all others; it was the only colour I could see.

My eyes took in the emerald satin in the coffin, and the new emerald tie around his neck. The tie—only four days, four hours and two minutes old—was a present from his mother for his birthday: the seventeenth of March. My mind turned emerald as I thought of that day: a cake with emerald icing in a room with emerald walls decorated with streamers and dancing balloons. I could see the room filled with guests, all dressed in their best emeralds.

It happened when he was eating the cake. His mother had told me not to do it, saying that crayons were dangerous, even to a grown man: dangerous even to a grown man who had tried to eat a crayon as a child. The situation was not one that could be repeated. Man could not triumph over crayon twice. But I had ignored her, imagining the look of delight on his face when he dug into the cake and found the brand new emerald crayon, hidden between the layers. But it went all wrong; he ate the cake without looking inside. Half of his piece was speared onto his fork, making its way into his mouth with the emerald crayon still hidden inside. Then a cough, a splutter, a gasp for air. No delight, instead, horror as the crayon lodged itself in his throat.

We tried to save him; a flurry of emerald as we rushed to dislodge the crayon I had meant to be a joke. But when his face turned a colour I knew no crayon would ever represent, I realized there was no hope. His mother had been right; man could not win against crayons twice.

As I stood next to his coffin on the day of his funeral, my eyes unable to see anything but the emerald that surrounded him, I willed the colour to disappear. I hoped that if it went away, so too, would my overwhelming guilt. I closed my eyes, blinked rapidly, but it would not fade. The luminous folds of satin still surrounded him, the tie from his mother still lay unmoving on his lifeless chest. Only four days, four hours and two minutes before, I had loved the colour and everything that went along with it. But as I stood next to the coffin, desperately trying to ignore the obnoxious colour, I thought I would loathe it for eternity. I thought I would be forever haunted by emerald crayons; the first that created the love, and the last that ended it.

But as the wooden box was lowered into the fresh earth, I noticed the myriad of stunning shades and tones surrounding me: hats accented with violet flowers and ties of sapphire silk; the ruby roses on his coffin; the rich burgundy of his mother's dress; the brilliant lemon of the daffodils. Every colour of the rainbow but one: emerald. The colour had been buried along with him.

Almost

Hilary Kim Morden

“Pull over here.”

I pull the car over to the curb and park. It feels weird to park on the left side of the street instead of the right. I am on the one-way road bordering the Auto Mall. I look toward the building in front of me. It appears foreign and, yet, familiar; like all the auto malls everywhere in the world, but also unique only to this one. I focus on the sound of the Dixie Chicks singing as my mind tries to still itself. I’m having trouble catching my breath and my heart is pounding so hard I feel the blood pushing against my neck. He leans forward and pushes the button turning the cd player off. I think of men and the way they move through the world – so sure of the things they create and use. I don’t find those parts of the world so easy to deal with.

“Put out your right hand.”

His voice is firm and sure, as though he has no doubts, no misgivings. I wonder at that as well. How can he be so sure when I am so conflicted? I hold out my right hand palm up and shut my eyes. Breathing might be easier if I can’t see.

I feel his touch before his hand reaches mine. Instinctively I close my hand and begin to pull away, then deliberately reopen it and hold still. I need to do this; I need to have him touch me. Afraid and expectant at the same time, I feel as though I am on the edge.

Slowly, I exhale as I feel his hand touch down on mine. I wait for the electric shock that occurred earlier during lunch when his hand accidentally brushed against my knuckles. But, it doesn’t come. Now his touch feels different. There is no sudden shock, just this feeling of warmth and arousal as his palm settles into mine. Shivers run up my arm and down my back. A sense of expectation settles into my abdomen.

“Get a room,” screams loudly in my head as he gently folds his hand around mine. The voice is so loud I am sure he has heard it too. Fearfully, I briefly glance at his face for confirmation, and am relieved to see that his concentrated expression has not changed.

Shutting my eyes again, I suspend. All that I feel is sourced in my hand and simultaneously throughout my body. I start with surprise and a sudden intake of breath as he grips tighter. I didn’t expect him to do that. I didn’t expect him to physically impose where only energy had been before.

Holding my breath, eyes closed, I wait for something more. Random thoughts glide through the suspended instant in my mind. His hand is warm, and smaller than I thought it would be.

I wait some more. I can not breathe. I am on the edge of something momentous. I feel an energy build to its utmost, needing to be dispelled.

I wait to be dispelled.

A thought emerges: if he slides his fingers between mine...I will be lost...I will fall off the edge. And, so, I wait for him to slide his fingers between mine, to feel his fingertips probe the most vulnerable and delicate parts of my hand. And, waiting, I feel his hand leave before he even moves.

A cool rush of air displaces the warmth left by his hand and dispels our tangled energy.

Disappointment rushes through me – there will be no resolution. My need to fall remains, unfulfilled. I let go of my held breath and then shallowly breathe in as I open my eyes.

“Now you,” he says, extending his right hand out to me, palm up, “use your left hand.”

I close my eyes and ponder his request. I can not look in his face for the answer. I know that my world will shatter if I do. It felt that way earlier when we first met for lunch. I looked everywhere except at him. He laughed and then told me he didn't think he could be friends with someone who wouldn't look at him. Yet, I wonder, are we friends?

Briefly, I peek at his hand, waiting patiently, suspended in front of me.

Twisting slightly in the seat so that my left arm can reach across I hold my hand over his and let it fall. But, before I make contact, his left hand shoots out and grips the wrist of my falling hand.

“Not so fast.”

A rush of heat licks across my cheeks. I feel shamed, as though I was too eager, unrefined. This feeling fuses with a long distant memory of the same emotion. I pull back a little and then hesitantly hover above his hand. The feeling of shame dissipates, pushed away by curiosity and a compelling need to touch him.

As my hand continues to hover, I ask, “Can you feel this?”

“Of course,” he replies.

I keep my eyes downcast and stare hard at his hand – the lines and scars that criss-cross his palms. I don't need to look at his face to see if he's watching me. I can feel his eyes on me. He must be smiling; I hear it in his voice. He seems entertained by my confusion, my indecision and my overwhelming feelings of arousal.

I place my hand in his, gently laying it there. There is no sense of holding it up or being held up. The two hands are simply suspended, one resting lightly upon the other.

I turn my face slightly away from him and stare sightlessly out the window. Emotions flicker through me; the conflict that began months prior plays out in my mind – and my body.

Time passes.

Pulling his hand away from mine he says, “You look like you're having a therapy session in your head.”

I look down at my hand as my fingers curl inward in a vain attempt to capture and hold the feelings he has aroused within me.

Opening the car door, he turns to me, “I'll leave you with that thought.” And, then laughing quietly he gets out of the car, “if I had known you were that close to an orgasm...”

He shuts the door and then hunching down into his jacket, away from the cold, he walks in front of the car and away from me, down the sidewalk without another glance in my direction.

Stunned, I put the car in gear and pull out, driving past him. I refuse to turn as I pass him to see if he's watching me, because I know he isn't. He doesn't have to watch. I have already given him all the information he could possibly need or want.

I briefly consider crying, but, somehow crying feels inappropriate for the emotion I am experiencing. But, I don't know what the appropriate reaction is because I can't define the emotion. I feel a mild sense of amazement that I can experience an emotion I have never felt before.

Amazement, arousal, and frustration all mix with a sudden feeling of loss and all that gets mixed up with a sense of “lost-ness” as I realize I don't know where I am, or how to get home.

In the diminishing light my car follows the curved road out of the Auto Mall onto the street and in a direction that I hope will take me back to my world, thinking –

If only he had slid his fingers between mine...

Ghosts of her Life

Hilary Kim Morden

The vision of the teenage girl in the studio window temporarily disconcerts her. The woman knows no one is home. She moves her head side to side, eyes holding steady on the girl's image, to see if it is a trick of light and reflection – a not unusual occurrence in her home as the house and the paned glass it contains are both very old. The girl's face becomes part shadow as the woman's perspective changes, but, she remains, behind the pane of glass, eyes solemnly watching, dark and compelling in her small oval face. The girl is so close that the woman can feel her sadness, deep within her own body. Yet, she knows she is not real.

She has long known that her life is shared by ghosts. She has no fear of them, nor they her; both cohabit quite comfortably. The woman doesn't actually like to call them ghosts, but she has no other name for them. She sees them as remaining energy; perhaps of past relationships, or, previous lives – either way, energy with a purpose. She believes that she pulls others to herself; others she is meant to interact with, and, for her, this includes the ghosts.

The teen girl watching her through the studio window is newer to her. She appeared when the addition to the house was being built several years ago. At first all she could feel was the girl's rage. However, now that the addition is complete she has calmed down; making her presence known in the studio when the woman has no students and is not playing the piano. The girl wanders the room aimlessly trailing her hand across the cool, slick-black surfaces of the pianos. Yet, she scarcely makes an impression. She has little substance; leaving the woman with a sense of uncertainty and vague anxiety; much the same way her life currently does.

The elderly man who paces the living room with even, measured steps has been with her for most of her adult life. She became aware of him during the long, spring days she awaited the birth of her first child. Frantically torn between her desire for a drink and an obsessively neurotic need to care for the gestating baby in her womb, the coming of this older man, with his steady way and heavy presence, gave her a feeling of constancy and surety. His existence has allowed her to avoid returning to the addiction that dictated most of her early years, and, she often wonders if he would leave her should she one day succumb, to the urge to drink – an urge that haunts her daily.

She rarely tells others of her ghosts; they require more explanation than she can possibly offer. Some, like her granny, needed no explanation. Her granny knew she came with others the day she was brought home, as a sickly newborn, from the hospital. Both she and her mother were desperately clinging to the fragile lives they had been given and her mother was not up to the task of caring for an infant, especially one that was constantly alert and agitated as though interacting with some invisible entity. Her granny had been more than willing to step in and care for her and when she was six told her that she knew. Her mother's response was to call her a liar and tell her to never speak of "it" again. Her granny is long dead, but always present to her; her mother alive, but less real to her than her ghosts.

Some days the stillness of the woman's ghosts haunts her. Alone, within the hushed, quiet of her home, children gone and husband often away, she feels them settle around her and she has difficulty knowing where she leaves off and they begin.

A few years ago she held a party to celebrate the completion of her home. Her friend, an Anglican Minister, offered to bless the house. She worried that the blessing would affect her ghosts. But it didn't. They remain. She wonders if it should have been her that was blessed and then maybe they would leave. Yet, as she gazes upon the shadowed face of the girl in her studio window, she dismisses the thought. She is not overly concerned. She made peace with her ghosts a long time ago.

Little Fawn
Jessie Somers

Louden Singletree | September 2010

Memento Mori

Hilary Kim Morden

So named because I've heard that if you call a child for relatives long dead, you beholden them to secrets whispered, promises made,
 and edicts obeyed,
 with no free acceptance of consequence.

So named because I've heard the insistent call of my sister, long dead, her childish voice breathing hotly in my ear Promise me,
 gripping my arm,
Anne with an e—
promise me.

So named because I've heard that promises made must not be broken, that even fingers crossed and Rosaries spoken can't keep you safe from secrets whispered or insistent sisters.

four: twenty three

Hilary Kim Morden

sometimes I wake in the early morning sporadic bird-calls breaking the pristine presence of night not wake to my heart pounding sweat pouring body shaking

but, wake still and quiet, as though I heard my name whispered

I lie, motionless eyes adjusting to the dim light 4:23 a steady red glow

it is here that I look for you my lost child caught in the thin membrane between dream and day

I find you huddled in the corner
your whimper the sound that brought me awake

I open my arms and you settle a tiny bird of fine bones against my breast your eyes search look inward and you try but like me cannot let go your breathing lengthens as you nest into me then, we breathe as one

Threads

Hilary Kim Morden

Threads linger and float tangle into snarls wisps of my past startling in their appearance.

I pick you off the surface of my life.

How was I to know that you would remain the unfinished seam raveling surprising me with errant threads that disturb my continuity my structure

my existence.

Ocean Triolet

Hilary Kim Morden

Beach glass shines dully, shades of the ocean, eternal it waits and peeks through the sand.
Eyes to the sunrise – peace, my devotion.

Wind pulls, gulls cry, waves make me understand, choices made without me, came from your soul.
Answering inner voice, one lone command.

Life is so hard, so dark and temporal a silent, small sigh linking worlds unknown.
Journeys begin when we feel their soft pull.

Some cross by freely, like wind they are blown, traveling above ground, ascendant they climb.
You passed by; your nature, never my own.

Alone on the beach, I ask one last time, will you wait, like the beach glass eternal?
Wait for me, stay with me, share your sublime?

All the Memories a Body Can Bear

Hilary Kim Morden

it surprised me to wake with you on my mind in this nondescript hotel room in a small prairie town so far from home

the cold October wind blew through the open window and set the chimes dancing as it tangled in my hair

I shivered in anticipation as the air followed the path left by your tongue come, you whispered stay with me now and I stayed,

    I followed

How could I ever refuse you eyes closed

I drift on the languorous tug of my own desire it pulls submerging me back back into my dream

I dream of my lips on your skin my hands on your arms our bodies twined and sheets tangled and wake to find myself alone in a nondescript hotel room

in a small prairie town
    far, far from home

Untitled
Erin Dugdale

Louden Singletree | September 2010

beyond the showbox

Shannon McConnell

I exit the doors of the club feeling my shirt stick to me like a freshly licked stamp the chilled night enfolds small crowds on the gum-speckled sidewalk unleash secondhand smoke and banter about the lack of skill of the opening band and that favourite song that never gets played

I weave through shoulders and unfamiliar streets finally resting my thoughts at second and pike standing on the cement curve as the space needle becomes my north star the humid breath of the city grazes my cheeks and I inhale a subtle scent of calm and coffee I walk without words as the sky dims the hum of decibels stay burrowed in my ears

departure

Shannon McConnell

at first light slow pull of the door a twist of a wrist wipe the key across denim removing four years of fingerprints the sedan packed high to the arc of the window two clammy hands on a tepid steering wheel drive the curves until everything gets straight

a single pillow waits in a house locked in the rubik's cube flatlands where knees were scraped a diploma grasped drive the lines until everything gets strange before crossing the transparent divide confessions are divulged to the dashboard apologies to those never immersed in water woe to ones whose embrace dissolved too soon far from cedars and skylines at arrival a glance and removal of time pressed against a wrist reveals a pale tribute to faithful origins drive the stretch until everything gets strained exposureShannon McConnell*

in the thick of dusk his heavily covered frame deflects wind and snow a frigid december night he rests his backpack on a wooden lookout a clearing among trees eyes expand as the distant fairmont hotel illuminates the mountain side and the snow covered stairs where he sits

he angles
a bulky camera skyward inhale the shutter opens muscles hold steady fighting the harsh temperature the collage of clouds roam against a charcoal backdrop strokes of green cedar branches funnel down through the convex glass burning into emulsion

exhale
the shutter releases capturing the coldest night between his hands

A Smile in the Sky

Jocelyn Rintoul

A combination of reflection in your colored eyes and deception in your subtlety
violet on the inside
red on the outside separated by lightening beams my little star dancing in the constellation of duplicity
and for once the clouds have overslept

The music was bleeding poetry
violet on the inside
red on the outside
a mosaic of scars and bruises tinted paint on the color spectrum
separated by the chords of some seraphim symphony telling the entire twisted story of how my fingers failed to grasp the stars

Asking questions of how and why and wanting to know the size of the sky because it's black through gray and white again the colors of simplicity then white through gray and black again a never ending tendency
separated by
the impossible scent of creosote and the sound of cicadas in July
violet on the inside
red on the outside

Into the Ocean

Jocelyn Rintoul

Its like being carried out on a riptide and smashed by a tsunami, then dragged over a coral reef and drowned in a puddle, in a tear.
But the trick is to keep breathing though its become too much a cliché, like cigarettes and beer,
and you.
Because somewhere in the stratosphere the stars are breaking, and somewhere in heaven
the angels are loosing sleep.
And bruises are back in style, but I thought we were cloud connected like stolen first kisses, like the rain,
like absinthe.
You were never poetry.
Though I found you dressed in imagery, it never seem to fit.
Now here you are broken and here you lie.
Just a nervous habit like a one night stand,
like falling in love,
like wine.

Snow Gnome
Grant Morden

Conrad and the Goat

Ron Dart

White goat gained thin ledge, pressed thick thighs upwards to precarious perch.

It was our day to take to the peaks,
Conrad and I, he the goat,
I
the eager kid on this granite slab.

The white haired monarch inched, eased ever upwards, position gained, stable for a second.

We were far from safe boulder field and alpine flowers below.
A thin pitch straight up, anchor now in place.

Thinnest of ledges tried, attained, lone guardian chanced yet loser rocks.

Conrad belayed me to an exposed, unwelcoming
overhang.
Heart beat too fast, fears had to be faced—a deeper place to yet go.

Goat had taken a bad route, instincts betrayed the elder, a hard choice to make.

We stopped, I unsure about going yet higher on austere unforgiving citadel of ages past.

It was a long jump, goat hesitated, legs quivered, tightened, sprang, sad was the missed ledge, sadder still the blood stained, body mangled mass.

I thought these mountain mentors could not err.

Conrad turned to me,
said
we should belay down.
And so we did.

Fish and Chips

Janet Vickers

Yesterday you fried halibut in Japanese bread-crumbs.
We ate on the balcony wearing sweaters and slippers listened to the steady rain against a million leaves inhaled pinot gris in the air.
You tell me I'm not fat just middle-aged.
Food, you say, is an honourable pleasure.
I wish this simple achievement for everyone to taste the tender flesh under crisp cover to feel this is enough, to want no more and want no less for others, but this morning I read of bombings in Lahore, Baghdad, Islamabad —pleasure not just interrupted but sacked for revenge. How silly my wish.
Once the tongue has tasted the enemy's blood will fish be enough? Will it be a sin to wear the sweater, the slippers, and to love the rain?

Ornaments

Janet Vickers

Sleep this night in another bed my love, while my limbs like wild animals sniff the sheets for delicious sleep the toe's nose pushing corners to the darkest point where two opposing tensions meet and dissolve into that reservoir inhabited by mute souls.

This is where we turn away from each other the day's incisors, hours chewed into portions for washing the floor we grimed with dirt from outside our door.

A Russian doll on the bookshelf fifteen years holds seven other dolls inside.
All wear the same expression in this light.
What is there to say about smug ornaments we've spooned from inconsequential details that recast our lives? They have their own opinions.

You and I have shared the unshaped too.
Worries hidden from kitchen and bedroom.
There is still so much we could learn from our recurring nightmares if we dared to sully the day with their warnings.

Together we could salvage the world because we live the mundane and know the politics of wrinkled bed sheets.

The Wedding

Janet Vickers

My white daisy appliqué dress, purchased cheap—a graduation dress with yellowed lining I only noticed a few days before The Day.
Mum had a fit looking for a dressmaker in Arnprior and the cost to fix it more than the dress itself here at the mouth of the Madawaska River where the Algonquin fished before Laird Archibald McNab brought his hundred to settle on eighty thousand acres, before Emmanuel Anglican was built, before the white pine logged, you from Huddersfield and I from Ruislip, came and promised our bones to each other not knowing where it all started but in the black and white album we are pretty, ignorant of the past, the future, and for me the present too—clumsy, confused, absorbed in anxiety about the way things appear 1969 was the year of The Edible Woman.

For Eyes
Daniel Mack

The Ticking of a Clock

Joshua Frede

When the world was first founded of water air and rock, on that dawn of days sounded
the ticking of a clock.

Man was born and woman too;
they crawled out of the dust.
Somehow even then they knew that rule the earth they must.

Mighty empires, young and old, they fight for wealth and land.
Power they shall never hold,
to stop the minute hand.

Rich men store up treasure vaults of unimagined cost.
Money can't bribe time to halt and soon it all is lost.

Famous men throughout the past, they carve their names in time hoping that their marks will last.
History too shall die.

Man may try to ward off death but sheep can only bleat.
There's a gift in every breath and every heart beat.

When the earth ends with a word and shepherd calls the flock, that constant sound can't be heard:
the ticking of a clock.

The Keeper

Jennifer Colbourne

Gentle fortress-steadfast in elegance bastion of a lost age of naiads, dryads, nymphs beautiful chapels and God

You are beautiful clung over in ivy, lichens, and moss recalling Arcadia
 that which is lost but shall never be found for it was a fable then and now-those green pastures.

Bewildered city skyscrapers overshadow you you weep, black streaks on the walls grieving for the unknowable fucking, texting, saturday night live.
 trying to trudge backward you're naively unaware you're a pretty ghost but obsolete

And the muses, but oh, oh! where have the muses gone?
    the supersensible, nature, the 3-in-1 (but haven't you heard? God is dead we had a lovely funeral, you would have loved the roses)
There never was a muse.

But must it be soa bang, a wimper, the world's end (come ye soon, oh whore of babylon?) Mankind blessed, damned, orindifferently lost in the abyss

Regardless, it is you who must cling Cling, cling, cling!
Cling, crumbling tower-cling to the holy book of fairy tales the elusive happy ever after.

If Only Romance Were Dead

Jennifer Colbourne

Yes.

The leaves are beautiful (bursting with color, blowing in breezes)
And I- my heart is twisted with grief

But I will tell you this:
the fat men are still eating the children.

Sonnet IV

Ray de Kroon

My love is like a pilsner in the sun a sparkling sprite, a jug with auburn tan beading on the beach with top undone whetting the pit where my desire began.

Clad only with a label green and red and yellow taut conceals her deeper fire my finger lingers near her label's edge caressing beading sweat to fuel desire.

Her voice rings clear as glass where nectar spills a bubbly kiss so close she kneads the nose immersed in intercourse, conversed in rills inebriated as her cadence flows.

I'm heady! Drunk with love! Intoxication!
Our mouths indulge in wanton carbonation!

Rajasthan
Rachel Chapman

Louden Singletree | September 2010

Station

Melanie Schindrig

The rain falls on rusty tracks Steam thick and sweet as honey clings to my skin, drips into my lungs I search for your face

Multicolored umbrellas, mushrooms sprouting
A train's whistle echoing through the twilight

I rush into the crowd people waiting, watching, waving Shoulders bump luggage knocks Running to the platform I catch a glimpse, of your train leaving,
Lost in the impending darkness.

I stand alone on the empty tracks
Rain falling on my face
I weep
The sky cries with me.

Crossing Over

Catherine Prentice

I found a hair woven through the sleeve of my sweater my sweet daughters

long shiny black

it found its beginning inside of me with a heavy belly on the eve of a winters full moon you blessed my world

many seasons have sprung faded since though, not enough it seems you blush now with the rosy red of womanhood

the moon pulled it out of you your pendulum sways coincides with the tides

the summer solstice moon is full dreamy hazy light shines from your eyes the spell is cast

Incubus

Catherine Prentice

Like a pest strip you dangle coiled in the corner sending out pheromones innate ingredients disguised as passive elements

attracting bodies any shape, size

the sight of those in flight arouses you the catch,

to capture

your guise, a shoulder ear
lip thigh

soul mate

when a beautiful winged creature lands on your sticky range of mental concerns your wits fill with elation

you draw they land

once captured transference takes place you gain another ally

this ritual sends an exhilarating burst of energy up your coil

when compliance is intact the only thing you miss the particular way certain wings played into your field

though comfort is fed as long as you hang twisted the possibilities are limitless.

Convallaria Majalis

Catherine Prentice

I step carefully through tiny white ruffle edged bells like pearls hanging from chartreuse ribbons delicately dotting the edge of the churchyard wafts of musky sweet odor impress memories of a field trip to St. Patrick's Parish and the voice of a Nun when I ask why these flowers grow around graves

she explains:
Mary's tears dropped to the ground as she cried at the cross turned into lily of the valley

my eight year old Presbyterianism, weak as it is casts doubt still, I hesitate when I hear the snapping of rhizomes, damaging sacred roots the Nun seemed superior, gentle, wise but she has not labored on this land sweat blood earned the right to wives tales besides Mrs. James, who sings on key, says:

these lilies are poisonous but the smell increases memory, a poultice cures gout, a liquor, smeared on the neck and forehead induces common sense.

with this bit of rationale up the sleeve of my Sunday dress I carry the courage to climb over a chaotic mass, rectangular stones that separate the bumpy churchyard from the larger mass of white bells I plan to explore free from church goers eyes where I can think out loud maybe even sing under the shade of giant sugar maples increase my memory, common sense but awkward footing in shiny black shoes slips on eroding inscribed granite slabs piled here when the road was widened settling my 90 pounds on the white landscape a foot sinks below the roots dangles into nothingness just below the surface of the ground balancing precariously on one foot a horror stricken panic tingles through every inch of my body as I realize my foot has broken through a grave

I pull my dangling foot to safety scramble over the discarded tombstones cringe as I wait for Mary's tears to drop to the ground, turn me into

lily of the valley.

Stiletto Foot
Maurice Motut

Vertebrae

Suzanne Kittell

in sleeplessness, i follow your skin like a map

i wander over vertebrae that veer off to the side like a road that bends around a tree too beautiful to be cut down

i am not prince hamlet

Suzanne Kittell

a disconnect between the eyes and lips the captive words within the pupils squirm but latent oaths to paralyzed tongues grip and shove this pregnant pause to far past term a wanderlust that's overwhelmed by space with everything and nothing left to find the way my fingers inch toward your face is pantomime presented to the blind i ask but for a start before an end beseech your honest eyes to never blink i cry that my beloved can pretend that all was not spelled out as clear as ink i fear my penstrokes all to be in vain and yet my patience far outweighs my pain

restless tradition

Suzanne Kittell

if skin could speak then mine would utter verse vocabulary learned from sleepless nights on crooked spines my silent words disperse expressing all the thoughts I cannot write and I spell august using wrinkled shirts quotation marks around a stuffy room and punctuated by how much it hurts when autumn ends all life in summer's womb the sonnets on my bedpost form a cage to quarantine my overzealous lips at dusk I try to burn each taunting page but cannot even brown the tattered tips I'm losing sensibility again but gaining ammunition for my pen

My Forest

Lisete Isaak

I wander through my forest bleak bones branching to the sky gray twilight mist silencing my cry last year's birth turned brown and brittle blankets the earth.

it crunches under me my forest creaks and groans it snaps overhead, it moans branches left to dangle amongst the rows of angled spines

I wait for it the feather-strokes of an artist's brush bones transform to velvety white pristine lines against the black canvas of the silent midnight sky then one by one rays of stars beam down and join my branches bathed in white my hands reach out and dance the winter's waltz of promise of forest renewed

At the Dinner Table

Nathan Owen

my dad was known to say that wolf cubs would get their necks cracked if their behaviour questioned the pack's integrity my brother would state that wolves often starved alone when they grew too old for their teeth they didn't talk much about other dogs, though domestication, they would say.

neutering, they thought.

Fall

Matthew Loewen

I could read her the sweetest poem
 About
     New leaves Fallen
             On Dead
                     Grass.
 But she has just woken up with
 The           Lingering           Silence           Of           Sleep Still Clinging
                     To Creaky
                             Branches.

“We are in different seasons,”
 I say,
 Closing the book.

“What?”

Grief

Esther Campbell

Empty well protrudes
From jagged rocks and prickles.
Morning again,
Mourning again.
Unseen eyes intrude
On faceless bones and rubble.
Poring again,
Pouring again,
Subduing pounding winds.

Bending Time
Jessie Somers

Untitled

Alexandra Watkins

Speak to me like you do when we lie alone in the dark
When I drowsily marvel at how the dimness and shared skin can undress a tongue
At how, with less encouragement, we will surrender more

Speak to me with a voice softened by the night I'll concede and lie down in this opiated rowboat
And your fingers will question And answer
And push me out to sea

Eggshell

Alexandra Watkins

You are the all-seeing egg candler, Holding me to the flame
And reading my embryonic thoughts,
The secrets that are curled inside a shell.

You read my poems, too.
“A shell,” you spit, “What insight!
Such a masterful metaphor for the Fragility of your pretense.”

My words will be crushed beneath your feet.
White lies become white dust Ground into the earth,
To nourish the garden where you Bloom with superiority.

Where your jaded carnations will dismiss me entirely And turn to consider the sun.

Space Invader
Grant Morden

Louden Singletree | September 2010

American Haiku

Hilary Turner

There's nothing left of you.
The hours I spent waiting Are unrecorded.

I gave you my best things;
You broke them all and said Look, they are no good.

Oh my sad soul that Wants, wants, wants
To leave a mark, somewhere—

Life is not a borrowed book.
Reading should leave an imprint, but You bring nothing to the text.

The seed you scatter will die.
Light passes through you.
You have learned to leave no trace.

Speak Why

Jennifer Maxwell

It is so nice to hear you speak
Of the travels of Odysseus To imagine the bare feet of Socrates To hear Gandhi's words To smell curry
Shawarma, Samosa, Souvlaki
You came with your legends on your back Your fairy tales attached to your feet
And when we Speak White
We tell your stories in your schools
We are an uneducated and illiterate people
But we are not mute.
Speak white? We speak it fluently.

Speak why
And guess why we keep our secrets as close as we keep our children Talk about Progress Of Nature and Language
Speak Why
Talk about the responsibility of humanity
About the Kindness of Canadians Sympathize with us Tell us about welfare
And government initiatives
We are a people ravaged by tuberculosis and smallpox

Talk about civil rights
Tell us again about Freedom and Democracy
But we don't believe that Freedom is a mot noir
We just define it differently

Speak Why
And let's discuss tradition
Hunting, Fishing
Religion, Politics, Education, Culture?
We are citizens of the 21st century Listen why!
Tell us what we want But you never ask us
How are you doing?
We are not alright
We are not doing fine
We scream it out loud
We scratch it on the walls of our reserves

We are the observers, spread out to the corners of the world
We are one thousand peoples One thousand Peoples!
Fixed on the earth
And we are each of us Alone.

Time Released
Grant Morden

Louden Singletree | September 2010

A Note on Contributors

Esther Campbell is in her last year of a degree in Physics and Psychology. Writing is something she does as a hobby and creative outlet. She wrote the poem Grief about a year after losing a very close friend.

Rachel Chapman is a geography major at UFV. She caught the travel bug a few years ago and has enjoyed many adventures since then, almost always with her camera at her side. Rajasthan was taken in the Thar Desert in India, not far from the border with Pakistan. This community has no electricity and gets their drinking water from an oasis that they share with the camels and livestock. Their homes are made mostly from camel dung, straw and sand.

Jennifer Colbourne is currently completing her BA as an Honors English major at UFV and plans to continue on to get her Masters degree.

Ron Dart has taught in the department of Political Science/Philosophy/Religious Studies at University of the Fraser Valley since 1990. He has published more than 20 books (including 4 books of poetry).

Ray de Kroon is a recent graduate (BA) and current student of UFV.

Josh Frede was born and raised in Chilliwack, where he has been privileged enough to live all his 22 years. He is a second year English major and has been interested in writing since elementary school. His favourite genres to read and write are fantasy and gothic.

Miriam Huxley is in her fourth and last year of a BA in English and History. She loves to write really weird stories, and spends most of her free time lazing (aka, doing nothing). Emerald is a postcard story about man's quest for superiority over crayons.

Suzanne Kittell is graduating this summer with a Bachelor of Arts Degree in English Literature. During her time at UFV, she has been the Vice President for the UFV Pride Network and the Association for Students of Philosophy; she has written and edited for the Cascade Student Newspaper; and has been a programmer and board member on CIVL Radio.

Matthew Loewen is a third-year UFV student and English Major who started out as a high-school student and then got sidetracked. He enjoys writing because it "keeps him busy". Among his literary influences are "The Iliad, Twilight, and everything in between". He lives in Vancouver.

Daniel G. Mack was born in Lahr, Germany on the 16th of February, 1981. He graduated from the University of the Fraser Valley in 2007 on the Dean's list with a double major in geography and history and he took his first university visual arts class in his final year of study. Since then he's been back to take more whenever he's had time.

Jennifer Maxwell is a fourth year student of History and French at the University of the Fraser Valley.

Shannon McConnell is an English Major at UFV. She previously studied creative writing, photography and music (classical guitar performance) at Kwantlen Polytechnic University. In her free time she enjoys writing, recording and performing music, photography and creative writing.

Grant Morden is in the final year of his undergrad at UFV and aims to graduate with a major in English and a minor in Fine Arts. His plans are to continue his exploration of art by pursuing a graduate degree in photography and hopefully to eventually find meaningful artistic work (not doing wedding photos).

Hilary Kim Morden is a crim/psych graduate student at SFU but fondly remembers her days as an undergrad at UFV (when she still had time to write creatively!) She has written one novel, two collections of poetry and a stack of short stories. She has won several writing competitions and has been published in Event Magazine and academic journals.

Maurice Motut is currently a student enrolled in UFV Visual Arts Diploma Program.

Catherine Prentice is a recent BA graduate from UFV (Visual Art, English, Psychology). Catherine will attend SFU this fall to complete a BEd in counseling, which will enable her to utilize her passion for creativity to inspire high school students and future clients to explore and grow through the creative process. Her work has been exhibited throughout the lower mainland.

Jocelyn “Jojo” Rintoul is a student at UFV. Most of her free time is spent writing poetry, though sadly, since starting university, that time is dwindling steadily.

Born and raised in beautiful Mission, B.C lives practicing watercolorist Jessie Somers. Having drawn since she was very young, Jessie began painting watercolor in 2004 and has continued to do so with keen interest in nature, portraiture, fantasy and the surreal. Jessie has been attending the University of the Fraser valley and plans to graduate with a Bachelor of Fine Arts in the spring of 2010. From there, she hopes to continue her art practice, possibly looking into illustration, teaching and travel.

Hilary Turner teaches English and Rhetoric courses at the University of the Fraser Valley. Over the years, she has read and taught a lot of poetry, but has only recently begun to write it. Hilary lives in Mission with her teenaged son, two cats, and a dog.

Scott Varga was born and raised in Abbotsford, BC and has travelled extensively for school and leisure. Through his experiences he has learned to dissect settings into components for ambiguous yet intimate narratives. Scott is in his final year of his B.A. and will be pursuing a M.Arch upon graduation.

Janet Vickers' poetry has appeared in several journals and anthologies, including "Down in the Valley" edited by Trevor Carrollan. She graduated with a BA in Adult Education from UFV in 2007, and currently lives on Gabriola Island. Janet is also the publisher of Lipstick Press (www.lipstickpress.com).

Alexandra Watkins is an English major at UFV. She describes herself as a voracious consumer of literature that is occasionally compelled to attempt some of her own.

Acknowledgements

The Louden Singletree would like to thank the following groups for their financial support. Without their contributions, this issue would not be possible.

The University of the Fraser Valley Student Union Society

The Rotary Club of Langley

UFV Criminology Department
UFV English Department

Louden Singletree | September 2010

The Louden Singletree

The Louden Singletree is UFV's literary and visual arts journal. Since 2009 the Louden has been a forum in which students, alumni, faculty and staff of the university can share their unique perspectives on the world.
In this issue:

Esther Campbell
Rachel Chapman
Jennifer Colbourne
Ron Dart
Ray de Kroon
Erin Dugdale
Joshua Frede
Miriam Huxley
Lisete Isaak
Suzanne Kittell
Matthew Loewen
Daniel Mack
Jennifer Maxwell
Shannon McConnell
Grant Morden
Hilary Kim Morden
Maurice Motut
Nathan Owen
Catherine Prentice
Jocelyn Rintoul
Melanie Schindrig
Jessie Somers
Hilary Turner
Scott Varga
Janet Vickers
Alexandra Watkins

